

Ladies and Gentlemen,

I do not believe that it is necessary for wireless VoIP telephones to be required to have 911 or other services. We already pay for these services on our land-lines and through our cellular phone providers.

There is also no need for every wireless device to have built-in GPS functionality. In the event that the equipment maker elects to add this technology to a device, consumers should be the ones to decide whether they would like to use it. We should have the ability to turn any service, whether on a land-line telephone, a cellular phone, a wireless device, computer, etc. on or off at our own discretion. We are the ones who pony up the dough for these devices and we should have full control over how they are to be used and over the range of services that we wish to use on each device.

Thank you for your time.
